

REASON FOR VALUATION DIVORCE AND SHAREHOLDER DISPUTES

Independent, defensible valuations for high-stakes personal and commercial disputes.

Why valuation matters here

When a business sits at the centre of a divorce settlement or a shareholder dispute, the valuation is almost always contested. Each party has a financial interest in a different outcome. Without an independent, credible valuation from a qualified third party, disputes drag on longer, legal costs escalate, and outcomes become unpredictable.

The cost of a weak valuation

In contested proceedings, a valuation that cannot withstand cross-examination – or that was prepared by a party with a vested interest – will be challenged. Courts and arbitration panels require expert evidence that is objective, well-documented, and clearly reasoned. A poorly prepared valuation does not just lose the argument – it can cost your client significant money.

- Courts in most jurisdictions require independent expert valuation evidence in contested disputes
- Internally prepared valuations are routinely challenged and discounted
- A credible independent valuation can anchor negotiations and accelerate settlement
- The gap between opposing valuations is often the single biggest driver of prolonged litigation

In disputes, an independent valuation reduces escalation. Clarity about value – reached independently and transparently – is often the shortest path to resolution.
